

The Jedda-Straats Singapore Collision

Peter Last

It was over thirty years ago, and I hope that my recollection is accurate. If not, no doubt somebody will correct me.

David Judell commissioned the Black Soo Jedda in 1961, and in 1968-9 sold her in order to move up to Samantha, a Duncanson 29. As mentioned in the article on the wreck of MV Yandra, Jedda was propelled under power by a Seagull long-shaft outboard motor. When not in use it was heaved up the backstay and held with a rolling hitch. David showed the new owner how he did this after the sails were hoisted, because there was a trick involved. If by then the yacht was making reasonable speed, the outboard was forced firmly back on its bracket, and it could be impossible to lift it without first killing the way. This problem led to what was almost a tragedy.

On a lovely Sunday, ideal for gentle sailing before the sea breeze freshened, the new owner took Jedda out for a sail. He had on board his son and his girl-friend, who went below to put on her bikini. Black Soos do not have head-room, so she was kneeling in an awkward posture when the crisis occurred.

It was dead low water. Jedda was more or less in the centre of the fairway, and the two men on deck were completely preoccupied with struggling to lift the outboard, no doubt with uncontrolled flapping sails and a swinging boom. Because of the state of the tide, the northern breakwater partially obscured their view of a freighter entering the River, although the pilot on the bridge could clearly see the yacht. He sounded a long blast on the siren, and then a series of urgent short blasts, which caught the attention of those working on our boats on the Squadron slip. One was Captain Preston ('Pep') Manthorpe, at that time a Port Adelaide harbour pilot. He said at once, 'This is something very serious!'

Enchantress, a Black Soo and sister ship to Jedda. After the death of Dr John Muirhead, Enchantress was lost by another owner on the breakwater at North Haven.

Too late the owner of Jedda saw the Straats Singapore bearing down on him. I do not know whether he tried to start the outboard engine or he was slow to gather way by hauling on his sheets, but he could not escape. The bow of the ship impaled Jedda just abaft the starboard chain-plates and pressed her on to her side before she filled with water and sank. The young woman was having difficulty with the top half of the bikini and she paused to make herself decent before she struggled out of the cabin against the water pouring in. Her strong sense of modesty almost cost her life.

Henry Rymill took several of us (including Pep) out in Nymen, and we were able to collect the three wet and chastened sailors to return them to the Squadron. The Straats Singapore carried her way to somewhere opposite Pelican Point. I was told that she ran aground there on the right bank of the River, but if so she soon got off with a rising tide. Jedda was on the bottom, so the Port was closed to all traffic.

Surprisingly quickly Jedda was got on to a cradle and hauled out. The starboard side looked as though it had been gnawed by the Kraken, with a gaping space about eighteen inches wide and as deep. David Binks (who built her) restored her so well that you couldn't tell the damaged side from the other. I heard there were problems with insurance, and I don't know what eventually happened to Jedda.

The moral is obvious. In a confined space like the Port River, maintain a proper look-out at all times. If those aboard Jedda had done so, they would have seen the approaching freighter over the top of the breakwater, with ample time to get clear.

Somebody said to David, 'How lucky you were that you sold Jedda when you did and you weren't on board when the freighter sank her.'

David's reply cannot be printed as he said it, but it strongly conveyed the obvious rejoinder, that if he had been there the collision would not have occurred.

The Jedda-Straats Singapore incident left a strong impression on me, and consequently I have tried always to maintain a good watch whenever I have been aboard a yacht in the Port River. Next time it may not end so well.
